

Medicare Should Expand Oversight Efforts To Reduce The Risk Of Harm Gao Dhhs

A new report from the Government Accountability Office (GAO) finds that Medicare needs to do more to protect its beneficiaries from harm. The report, which was requested by Congress, found that Medicare's current oversight efforts are not sufficient to identify and prevent all types of harm, and that the program lacks the authority to take strong enough action against providers who put beneficiaries at risk.

The GAO's findings are concerning, and they highlight the need for Medicare to take steps to improve its oversight efforts. The report makes a number of recommendations for how Medicare can do this, including:

- Expanding the scope of Medicare's oversight activities to include more types of harm, such as medication errors and hospital-acquired infections

- Strengthening Medicare's authority to take action against providers who put beneficiaries at risk, such as suspending or revoking their Medicare billing privileges
- Increasing the number of Medicare staff dedicated to oversight activities
- Improving Medicare's data collection and analysis capabilities to better identify and track instances of harm

The GAO's recommendations are a good starting point for Medicare to improve its oversight efforts. However, it is important to note that these recommendations will only be effective if Medicare is willing to commit the necessary resources to implement them. Medicare has a responsibility to protect its beneficiaries from harm, and it must do more to ensure that this responsibility is being met.

In addition to the GAO's recommendations, there are a number of other steps that Medicare can take to improve its oversight efforts. These include:

- Working with providers to develop and implement best practices for patient safety
- Educating beneficiaries about their rights and responsibilities under Medicare
- Empowering beneficiaries to report instances of harm

By taking these steps, Medicare can help to reduce the risk of harm to its beneficiaries and ensure that they receive the high-quality care that they deserve.

Medicare is a vital program that provides health insurance to millions of Americans. However, the program has been criticized for its lack of oversight, which has put beneficiaries at risk of harm. A new report from the Government Accountability Office (GAO) finds that Medicare needs to do more to protect its beneficiaries, and it makes a number of recommendations for how the program can do this. Medicare should implement the GAO's recommendations and take other steps to improve its oversight efforts. By ng so, Medicare can help to reduce the risk of harm to its beneficiaries and ensure that they receive the high-quality care that they deserve.
