The investigation took a sinister turn when Brian's blood was found in the apartment of his friend, Matthew Kline. Kline became the prime suspect, but he repeatedly denied involvement in Brian's disappearance. Without a body or a clear motive, prosecutors struggled to build a strong case against him.

Brian Shaffer's case became a cold case, leaving his family and friends in a state of limbo. His parents, Sandy and Randy Shaffer, refused to give up hope and spent years searching for answers. They hired private investigators, conducted their own searches, and even appeared on television shows in an effort to keep the case in the public eye.

In 2012, a break in the case came when Kline was arrested for a probation violation. While in custody, he made incriminating statements that led to his indictment for Brian Shaffer's murder. The trial that followed was a media sensation, and the jury ultimately found Kline guilty of murder.
