In 1940, Brasse was arrested by the Gestapo and sent to Auschwitz. He was assigned to work in the camp's photography department, where he was forced to document the arrival of new prisoners and the daily life of the camp.

Brasse knew that he was risking his life by taking these photographs. The Nazis had strict rules about what could be photographed in the camp, and anyone who violated these rules was severely punished. But Brasse felt compelled to document the horrors of Auschwitz, so that the world would know what was happening there.
